Not illustrated. 1874 Excerpt: .The members of Congress from California knew that their election was in part owing to this feeling, and that much was expected of them by their constituents, They failed not when the time arrived; but to one--A. A. Sargent--more than all others, is California indebted for the great work which now binds her to her Eastern sisters. But we are proceeding too fast, overlooking, but not forgetting, another name, none the less honored because the bearer lived not to behold the final completion of the work he initiated and so earnestly advocated. Theodore D. Judah, who now sleeps the sleep that knows no waking, but still his presence can be seen and felt in every mile of the grand road which his genius brought into being. His name is a household word in the West, for thousands new and appreciated the manly spirit and genial mind of the earnest, persistent and sanguine Engineer. In the then little hamlet of Sacramento dwelt C. P. Huntington, Charley Crocker, Mark Hopkins, and a few others--warm personal friends of Judah--who often, in the long winter evenings, gathered around the stove in Huntington Hopkin's store room, and there discussed the merits and demerits of the Judah theory. These and some other gentlemen became convinced that the engineer was right--that the scheme was practicable. They subscribed $50 apiece, and, in the summer, Judah and his assistants made a careful survey of the passes in the Sierras. This was in the summer...
